

Despite its larger size, the warehouse is pretty well filled up.

A Legacy of Collecting

Glance at the house as you drive past, and you probably won't see it. But, nestled in a set of garages behind a modest home in sunny SoCal is a treasure trove of automobilia, petroliana, bicycles, motorcycles, cars, vintage machines – pretty much everything a car guy could want.

"My Dad started collecting decades ago, and he just never really stopped," said Keith of his father, Kenny. "He loved cars, especially Jaguars and hot rods, but he was interested in a lot of different things, so he collected a lot of different things."

As such, Kenny built four garages behind his home, one more along the lines of a small warehouse, in which to keep the cars and treasures he was amassing. Each garage is a bit of a reflection of the last, but they each have their own purpose and flavor, and it wouldn't be a sin to use any of them as a working garage. Despite the massive amount of memorabilia, the floors are concrete, the walls are basic, the lighting is fluorescent and really, nothing screams museum. The garage itself allows the eclectic collection to speak for itself and take center stage.

Main garage on the property is a small warehouse type.
